

November 2nd 2009

Jon

5 themes of geography

The five main themes of geography are place, movement, environment, interaction, and region. If you have no idea about what these five themes are, than you can look in a textbook or read them right below.

Place is something in the world that is located somewhere. A place could be anywhere. It could be inside a house, it could be some ones backyard etc. Places are everywhere in the world. We live in Canada which is a place. We live in Ontario which is a place too. An island off the oceans is a place. So a place is somewhere in the world that we know about.

Movement is when there are things moving around. People walk, run, and drive cars. That is movement because they are moving. When people walk their legs move, which is movement. Also cars and trucks that are on the roads moving are moving on the road or highway to get some place. Movement is just when people or things are moving around.

Environment is the type of things people or things people do differently in an area. In the ocean there are no people living in it. It is all fish and sea creatures that live under there. That would be called the environment under the sea. The environment on land is where there are people and different types of animals living on the earth's surface and not under the ocean. Environment is the type of culture in a particular area.

Interaction is when there are things interacting with other things. When people are talking to each other, they are interacting. When animals are making noises to other animals they are interacting with each other to. Earth can interact with people and animals because when there is a storm going on the people and animals have to go find shelter so they don't get hurt. Also some storms can be so bad that they destroy the human made things on earth. Interaction is when things are doing other things to people or animals.

Region is kind of like place but place can be anything. Region is a part of the world. A region in the world might be the Middle East. The Middle East is a region in the world because it is a big part of it while a place could be a little part of the Middle East. The region is where people might be doing different things than in another region. The Middle East uses lamas for transporting goods while the region North America uses trucks and vehicles for transportation. Region is just a part of the world.